Former British Prime Minister Gordon Brown on the MK-Ultra Gate Hot Seat

'Discomfort', 'anxious', 'stressed' and 'nervous' describe how these two world leaders, both past and present, appeared when stepping into the diplomatic corridor's spotlight of transparency and accountability during the second week of April 2011.

Just how worried Britain's former and Germany's current leaders are about MK-Ultra Gate is evidenced in two appearances – the former on MSNBC's 'Morning Joe' on Monday, April 11th, and observed in real time and the latter in Germany in the company of Secretary of State Clinton on Thursday, April 14th, that was uploaded onto YouTube. Beyond both being repeated contributors to back-channel diplomacy they have one distinction in common with President Obama. They both extended an invitation to the Custodian to visit them and both failed to follow through; making it three-for-three in the world leader category of coalition partner who made it appear there was an acknowledgement of the 'Custodian' as the only internationally legitimized political leader of Canada as a result of discussions and a purported 'election' during the April 2009 London G20 Summit. Their motives for those initiatives and everything else they did to advance the reform and accountability agenda are now suspect.

Gordon Brown's interview is most revealing how trepidatious world leaders are about the scandal and especially after three of their counterparts stepped forward and America's Fourth Estate condemned the secret piggybacking on Chinada's military human experimentation program. In attendance at the 'Morning Joe' interview was Jim Cramer, whose characterization of the downfall of the U.S. President on March 17th is akin to the assassination of Julius Caesar rattled elected officials in every coalition country. He, the two co-hosts and a guest host put the former Prime Minister on the hottest of hot seats; and it's blatantly obvious he felt the pressure. In addition to his anxiety throughout, specific instances of body language speak volumes for what he expects when the news breaks internationally; reacting with palpable stress when hearing questions, answers and remarks that had geo-relevance.

The beginning of the interview leads to this, which set the tone for everything that followed:

Then Joe asks him a question about soccer and there is one phrase in it that triggers a 'guilty' expression. It's [ @ 1:11 ] to "Every time you think they've turned the corner they will lose to a Westham...":

The former PM, who knows firsthand how much his predecessor was raked over the coals about being central to the invasion of Iraq and what he went through in terms of commissions, inquiries and domestic and international condemnation, couldn't have felt the pressure more when he answers a question with "It's a real fight to the finish and it really won't be sorted out until the last day". He instantly gets dry mouth, which leads to licking his lips. Every seasoned litigator and senior judge views this behavior from those on the witness stand as proof of profound uneasiness.

Jim's watching how the former leader is responding during the interview and in particular to how he answers the question; and here's the start of what would become unrestrained disgust:

The tension is so intense the PM executes an embellished protracted Blair Maneuver from 1:39 until 1:51. The lexiconic gesture is named after his predecessor and is his way to not just expressly acknowledge the interview's geo-political sub-text, but also the MK-Ultra Gate scandal in which he's implicated.

When the topic turns to that which Jim was called in for, the PM states [@ 2:08] "Ireland's got huge problems because they're basically guaranteeing every penny that the banks have lost".

He's stating on the record with his body language that (i) he and his counterparts are facing a most serious scandal and (ii) their respective governments collectively owe the Custodian his ratified quantum since as per the agreement they didn't seize these funds from those primarily responsible for his predicament.

MSNBC producers get creative as they're watching him 'confess'. They choreograph a staffer to walk through the background [@ 2:36] and when right behind him effect a Clooney M..

More stress is observable [@ 3:01] timed to "Equally the deficit is the product of low growth". The operative and guilty conscience emotion triggering adjective is "low" as in how much he and other coalition leaders stooped being complicit in or having condoning knowledge of the piggybacking unlawfulness.

Co-hosts Mika and Joe show their disgust at what they see as a confession to some kind of involvement with MK-Ultra piggybacking.

When Mika makes this comment [@ 4:08] "Obviously in this country we have a really bad situation in terms of young people and finding employment", the former PM again reacts when hearing "bad situation".

As much citing accurate statistics [@ 4:30] as to employ the lexicon for the purposes of capitulation Mr. Brown states either consciously or subconsciously to appease his hostile audience:

So you've got 20% youth unemployment in America; we've got 20% youth unemployment in Britain and you've got 20% youth unemployment in the rest of Europe. Then you go to the North African and Middle East countries – 35% in Egypt.

Then [@ 5:06 photos x2] more grimacing to "If you don't do something in Egypt in the next year... opportunities are so limited" [5:29: photos x4].

Jim's reaction to what he sees [x5] is more proof just how much the "Right Honourable" guest's actions and reactions confirm and reconfirm what lies at the core of the scandal.

More disapproval and condemnation is witnessed during a long answer Jim gives [from 5:55 – 6:40]:

The guest reacts to this anger:

Jim adds an O-S M. [@ 6:29]: to "your bottom line" which is to say that exposure and accountability inescapably drives everything going forward and the outcome.

More admonishment is fired at the former PM [@ 6:41] at the conclusion of his answer.

He and the guest commentator create a wall of lividity that cannot but drive home how constituents of the coalition membership are committed to divulging this malfeasance to the public and letting accountability agencies do what's necessary to make things right on all levels.

As the interview winds down the PM finishes a long answer with a protracted grimace [@ 10:02]:

Jim again reflects on the outside what he's feeling on the inside to what he's witnessed [@ 10:14]:

During the last few seconds of the interview the beleaguered guest tries to placate his hostile in-studio and diplomacy archive entry reviewing audience with what he wants everyone to see as a clever reference to the Custodian and his quantum entitlement:

Well you know what we say in Britain: the first five hundred years of any institution is always the most difficult. The Monarchy's gone for a thousand years or more. And you know someone said there'll soon only be five queens left – the queen of hearts, spades, diamond, clubs and Britain.
